I've worked as a software engineer with a focus on image editing. When I started, I quickly ran into the limitations and compromises of the Mac's OS X and its built-in software. It's slow, bloated, and a synonym for "not user-friendly." For me, that just wasn't acceptable, so I started going elsewhere, I work with Adobe Photoshop. It is the professional photo editing software from Adobe. It is one of the most commonly used and used photo editing software. It is all very useful and easy to use. I now own a second monitor, and Photoshop CC is the first application I can use full screen on this second display. Even then, I frequently carry my wallet or a small notebook with me everywhere I go to make sure I can access the documents I need without having to open a compact office suite. My computer currently looks like a small purple terminal from the '80s. The browser and the program are all a bit of a pain. But there is virtually no difference between web browsing and software windowing, so if you can handle one of those, Photoshop should just be a breeze.

While the color picker tool works well for established users, the eyedropper tool can be an essential app for designers who want to learn how to navigate color more efficiently. This tool will identify and define colors from any given image. The first of these steps is to choose a color using the color picker. The color picker is handy and easy to use, but it can sometimes be a hit-or-miss tool. To make your selections more accurate and more comfortable, use the eyedropper to identify the exact color you want to change. This step allows you to get accurate color matches. You are able to use one type or a combination of different types of colors that will work together. For instance, when you want to change the color of an object, the eyedropper tool offers 10 preset color palettes to get you started: current selection, black, blue, green, cyan, magenta, red, yellow, orange and grey. If you want to change the color of a palette, simply click on the palette you want to change, and the eyedropper tool will identify the selected color. You can also make your selections by pressing the Alt key while you select the color. Photoshop offers five preset color models for colors that you can choose from. You'll see a cross-hatch pattern on the bottom of the color picker tool to show you which of the five color models is selected. Each color model has its own set of values, but without more information, you might have trouble knowing which of these models to choose and which to stay away from.

With a straightforward interface, it is perfectly adequate for amateurs to create professional looking images.
