Today's organizations are struggling with the challenge of breaking down silos to unlock agile, flexible cultures in which people and assets move from one area to another more seamlessly. As a result, they often move quickly to hire new employees but realize later on that they have put their people in a position where they can't or simply don't have the tools to effectively do the work they are charged with accomplishing. With a combination of tools, policies and training, administrators and managers can help their organizations not only unlock creativity and innovation but also eliminate the need for expensive and time-consuming hiring and training processes.[Necessity of seroepidemiology studies into the preservation of cold-storaged biological materials]. A study of the efficacy of a number of storage media on the preservation of blood samples is presented. For the purpose of the study, the viability of various biological samples stored in an almost ideal state at different temperatures, i.e. at a temperature of -196 degrees C, in the presence of mineral oil of different viscosities was assessed. The analysis was performed on the basis of the results of the enumeration of the erythrocytes, assessment of
