Parents of children with learning disabilities (LD) can have difficulty in communicating with their children. The purpose of this study was to describe parent-child interaction patterns in young children with and without LD and identify relations with age, children's IQ, and sex. Actors portraying both children and parents were videotaped during observation periods of five minutes each. Twenty-four families participated (eight from the LD group and 16 from the comparison group). One rater coded each videotape. Primary codes were parent-child interaction patterns and parental responses to the child's activity. Significant differences were found between the groups in parental responsivity to their child's activities. These differences were age-related, related to IQ and similar in sex. Differences in parental responsivity were related to age, and child IQ and sex. The results indicate that more research on parent-child interaction patterns is required to determine their possible importance in helping to diagnose and treat children with LD.'s because I'm the only one who knows about it," he said. "The stuff I put in this car doesn't work, if I put your stuff in my car, it would work. And vice versa. That was crazy." On the other hand, testing your spy gear with "real live" targets is always a good idea. The main point is figuring out if it works. In this case, it did, as the undercover cops were able to get their cameras into his limo without any hassle. Robert Dubin, an attorney and author of "The Ultimate Spy," said it's hard to communicate the real power of the skills used by undercover cops. "Look, we're not talking about a single gem of information or a single recorded voice clip," he said. "We're talking about anything -- any inkling, any hint that someone might pass along something to another. If it's credible information -- or even something so trivial as a name and address -- f988f36e3a
